For almost 40 years the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) has supported voluntary family planning programs in developing countries. Administered through the Office of Population and Reproductive Health, USAID-supported family planning programs enable couples to choose how many children they will have and when, save the lives of mothers and children by reducing deaths due to pregnancy-related conditions; and improve overall family and household well-being.

You can learn more about USAID family planning programs by visiting the Health/Population page of the USAID Web site at the address above. The site includes:

- Overview of program organization, strategies, and goals
- Population and health statistics from more than 50 countries
- Links to HIV/AIDS resources
- Information on USAID's participation in the 15th International AIDS Conference in Bangkok (July 2004)
- Population and health news and related press releases
- Upcoming event and conference information
- Comprehensive list of funding sources and partnerships

USAID and the Office of Population and Reproductive Health hope that this information will raise your awareness of the many population- and health-related issues confronting the world today and stimulate your interest in joining us and our many partners worldwide in finding solutions to them.
